ACADEMIC PROFILE

I study social stratification, particularly concerning intergenerational transmission of education, reading practices, and health inequality. In my Ph.D. project, I showed how stratified parenting practices lead to inequality in children's reading and educational performance and attainment. In my first postdoc project, I used individual-level library data for the entire population of Denmark to study how parents and libraries shape inequality of opportunity via children's home reading environments. In my current position as Researcher at the Rockwool Foundation Research Unit, I study how inequality in who experience health shocks impacts stratification in children's development, etc. In future work, I aim to study how institutions and interventions can moderate family inequalities.
